White-water River Grading

International white-water standards assign six grades to rivers, the higher the grade the more challenging the river. In general, grade one rivers are suitable for novices to navigate without a guide. In most cases, a grade five river is the highest level that commercial rafts can navigate. Only the most experienced paddlers should ever attempt rivers that are given a grade six. Grade three and higher usually require that the participants must be at least fifteen years old. White-water grading can vary depending on the time of year. In spring, rivers may swell thus increase it's grading; in summer it may be calmer and receive a lower grade. For many who are unsure about the sport, a river with a grading of two or three may be a good place to start. White-water rafting operators usually supply helmets and life jackets. Remember you are going to get wet so it is a good idea to bring a change of clothing and towels to dry yourself off after the trip.

Some white-water safety issues should be considered the guide should hold a first aid certificate;

the guide should carry a first aid kit;
the trip leader should have radio contact with Medical Air Rescue Services (MARS) in the event of an emergency.
